

Newborn film shoot list

that you can make a film from

You need surprisingly little footage in order to create a lovely little keep sake film with lots of emotional impact.

Even dad will be crying at your next viewing, not just the mum.

Start small.

It's not about becoming a videographer. No fancy gear. No long hours of editing. Just build the video along side your photography.

Moments to film in every newborn session

Those indulgent baby stretches

Cute baby feet

Moving baby portrait

Tiny fingers holding hands

Parents rocking baby

Parents together with baby

Feeding baby

With sibling (if relevant)

Putting it together

Now you have a perfect little set of footage that will enable you to create a beautiful little keep sake film for your family. If you add the still images too your film will be even longer.

Don't forget you can also use this content in your marketing materials.

Adding still images into the final film means when the family watch their film again in the future they will also see their images again and I really love that – having both in the same place.

The key is variety and emotion.

If we haven't met

I'm Dorte — a photographer who's been quietly adding video to my newborn shoots for nearly 10 years. I didn't start with fancy gear or complicated setups; I simply built video around what I already knew from photography. Today, I love helping photographers add video to their sessions, the simple way. Video is also a great way to add more value and also to stand out from other local photographers.

MY APPROACH

Minimal gear

Gentle video

Build slowly

Use what you know from photography
